BUILDING A BRIDGE OF EMPIRE TRADE

THE SYDNEY BRIDGE

In one of the great iron and steel centres of the North of England, thousands of men are working day and night. The huge blast furnaces are filled and tapped; giant cranes rattle overhead, and the red-hot ingots of steel are rolled and shaped by the ceaseless cogging mills. From a neighbouring wharf the finished plates and girders are loaded

The first stage of an Empire Bridge is complete

Now follow the ships across the seas; far away to the other side of the World, but still within the limits of this great Empire.

Over the beautiful Harbour of Sydney in New South Wales is rising a mighty Bridge. For weeks and months the ramps and approaches have been levelled and prepared, the great flanking towers built, and now from either bank the largest arch in the World, a single span of sixteen hundred and fifty feet, is slowly reaching towards the centre.

One hundred and seventy feet it will hang above the Harbour, carrying on its massive one nundred and seventy reet it will hang above the Harbour, carrying on its massive girders no less than four railway tracks, a fifty-seven foot roadway and two footways, while the greatest Ocean Liners pass easily beneath it. Day by day the fitting and riveting of the shiploads of steel plates and girders from England bring it nearer to completion.

Here is indeed a Bridge of Empire!

In competition with the whole World the order to build the Sydney Bridge was given to Britain by the Empire Overseas. It will cost £4,250,000, and the making of its 50,000 tons of steel will have provided employment for thousands of British workers

New South Wales is a big country, but it is only a fraction of the Empire. Nevertheless, it has given this huge order to Britain, and shown what the Empire can and will do to help British Industries.

What enables the Empire Overseas to give orders for British Iron and Steel? THE SALE OF EMPIRE GOODS
